

The New York Sun publishes a report of an interview with a lady engaged in the business of renting dresses: "I am the inventor of this business," she said. "If you know anything about women you know that the most of them have not only a passion for dress, but a weakness for novelty. The woman with one calico dress wants two, and the woman with ten silk dresses wants eleven. This rule is good with the owners of the most complete wardrobe. Another thing you may not know, women don't like to wear the same dress to more than one or two parties in one season. Now, it is upon these female characteristics that I thrive. You would naturally guess that only the poor ladies hire dresses; but that isn't so. Rather the reverse is the case. A good many of my callers ride within a few blocks of here in their carriages, and walk the balance of the way. It wouldn't do, bless you, to be caught hiring a dress; but I can assure you that many a borrowed one is worn by a fashionable caller. Sometimes, too, a lady from out town wants to go to a party or to the opera. She has only a traveling dress with her, and borrowed finery is her only recourse. The business, however, is not entirely confined to renting party dresses. There is an occasional call for a street dress, sometimes by shop girls, who want to indulge in an afternoon walk on Broadway. Once in a while an actress, suddenly called upon to play a part out of her town, or from a desire for a greater variety than her wardrobe affords, rents a dress for a week; but they usually want dresses that are too showy, or too peculiar or pronounced in color and make-up for my business.

How is that? Well, I'll tell you. It would half kill a lady to be caught wearing a hired dress. To protect them against such a terrible catastrophe I must alter the appearance of a dress every time it is worn. So you see the caller must not be too exacting in her requirements. Women beat the dickens for remembering what other women wear, but by a little ingenuity I manage to disguise my goods so that they can't be recognized. As I have said, I only use colors that are not too dark, and I trim, trim, trim, too, every time it is worn. A slight change in this respect is enough to destroy the identity. Of course, if you saw a dress one night with one kind of trimming, and the next night with another kind, you would be puzzled. A lady in a different gathering, you would not be apt to recognize it simply because the cut and color were the same. Besides, I usually have two waists for each skirt, so as to be able to fit different ladies, and these are not cut in the same style. Here, for instance, is a purple silk skirt and two waists. One is low-necked and very short-sleeved. That is large enough for a tolerably plump lady. The other is a slender form, and is only cut away in the neck and the sleeves are long. Naturally, the plump ones want the first kind, and the slender ones the other. If all my patrons would grow of a size it would save a great deal of trouble. Should I ever rent a dress without having to let out or take in the waist. Now, here is one that I was at work on when you called. Blue silk? No, no; that is satin, not silk. The waist is small now—if you were correct, you would say it was a right cut that didn't measure twenty inches. It was worn last night by a young lady whom I know to be in more than comfortable circumstances. She concluded rather suddenly to go to a party, and had nothing to do but to say that she had nothing that hadn't previously been worn at gatherings where the same people had seen her. The dress is engaged for to-morrow night by a lady slightly stouter, and I am letting it out after the trimming.

"What do I charge? Well, from $3 to $5 for the party dresses, and less for street dresses. If they get spotted, torn or damaged beyond a reasonable amount of wear, I charge for the dress, and a nice dress is a very thing to spoil. A spilled cup of coffee, or a big grease spot, and it is gone; but I have an advantage that a dress-coat renter hasn't—I can make over my damaged goods and offer them then out as good as new. Yet, with all the advantages a nice dress is done for in about one season, so you see the profit isn't so great, after all, when you consider the constant work of altering and rettriming. It is awfully wearing, too. Women are so particular. A dress never exactly suits, of course, and the patience of what's his name—Job? thank you—is needed to please them. A great many, too, come out of pure curiosity, just to find out what they are really and truly rented. Perhaps they expect to catch some of their friends hiring one. They always pick out a dress, though, and say 'Keep that for me until next Wednesday,' or 'I'll make up my mind to-morrow.' I never look on a bargain as made with a woman until the money is in my hands, and I always get my pay in advance.

"What security do I have against losing the dress? Well, if the lady gives me her name and address I insist on sending the dress home for her. That gives me an opportunity to learn whether she has given her right name, and if she has, why that is security enough. The excuses that my callers give are funny enough. One says she has plenty of dress at home, and she doesn't want to just for the fun of the thing; another hasn't time to get one made; another can't see why it is any worse to hire a ball-room dress than a masquerade costume. As if I cared why they patronized me. I never ask any more questions than I can help, and so I seldom know where the dresses are worn unless they volunteer the information. Now here is a new white silk that was hired last week by a girl who had been invited to a fashionable wedding. She was young and pretty, and I imagined that she was a poor relation of the bride or groom. Anyway, she was so nice and sweet that I took a pleasure in fixing her up for the occasion. I'd have given the price she paid to have seen her rich relations stare and wonder.

"Am I ever unable to fill an order? Oh, yes—sometimes. An awful big dress came in one day, and wanted a nice street dress. She lived somewhere in the suburbs, and wanted to make a fashionable call. But I couldn't fit her—hadn't a waist that would go more than two-thirds around, and she had to go away without a dress. I had a call last week for seven mourning dresses for a funeral, and couldn't fill it. You see, I hadn't anticipated any demand in that line; but I shall probably have a quantity of black goods made up. Once a girl came and wanted to go to a fashionable dress. She said she was in a great hurry, and seemed a good deal flustered. She picked out one, and said it would do. I took a pleasure in making it. What made me wonder was that she had a good dress already as the one she
